The quiet hours of Salbath day Mai cares of warth have sped away; My precious babes demand my care, And keep me from the House of Frager. And often when the Subbaths come The precious hours are spent at home, Restless childhood to restrain And eave from every needless pain Yet not in vain to us were given Then types of innocence and Heaves -They teach us oft with guileless art, The simple virtues of the heart, The calm repose of perfect love. That doubt or danger cannot move. No fear disturbs their peaceful rest When pillowed on a mother's breast -Or, if perchance a frightful dream Breaks their slumber with a scream, Her voice with softest tone Bide she phantom danger gone. And emiles iffome the rosy cheek, An Angel's presence to bespeak -

Thus would my heart secorely rest With childlike faith upon His breast, Who guides the tempest and the storm, And in his wisdom made the worm. I would but espend; doubts arise As clouds enshroud the fairest skins Yet o'er your puth I may not throw My shadow - May you never know, A doubt or fear, but ever find Calm repose and peace of mind. And when the day of life is past Share the joye of Heaven at last, And welcome in that happy land, Each member of your bousehold band, Each fair child whose early youth, You've guided in the way of truth. And the manly heart in which your own Has found a resting place and home, Twilight comes with quickning pace, Invests the scene in sufter grace, And from the glowing western sky, The gorgeous tints of sunset die; The gold and red melt into grey-And shadows fit as shadows may, Where golden sunlight used to play, And all was fair and bright and gay. Yet through the deepening gloom of night Stare beam out with purer light.

Thus o'er the heart in one dark hour, May sorrow fall with blighting power, And earth's fair ecence we loved before Pall to charm or please on more: Whispering winds with dirge like strain Sigh in mournful cadence o'er the plain, And to our view a pall of gloom, Rests o'er all the opening bloom, And sadness blends with every lay That selve 'mong the groves of May, Thee have I felt when lovely engine Her fairy wreath around me fings And fowers spring up on every sod By natures viewless Author trod-I've wondered, in this wondrous plan, Borth has no spring for dying man! The fields resumed their robes of green, With opening bads ambroidered 'round And all the wide apread wastes of air Are rocal now with joyous sound; Nature's choir of tinny throats Swell anew their evectost notes And every flower that docks the plain, Or blushes in the lowly vale Breather sweetness on the air And performed every massing gale O'er hidden springs and silent streams The moun with silvery radiance cleams And wer the cold and silent grave Grass and flowers in beauty wave; But to the form that roots beneath Returns no more the parted breath-The sulsaless heart shall feel no more The thrill of love or friendship's power

Branch in my arms, and by my side-My clinging Vies went forth at eventide, To "run a race" among the flowers wild Dear to the heart of every artion child. With bounding step we swiftly flow, Along the meadow wet with dew, We passed the violet in our walk Nodding o'er its lowly stalk And passed to think how passing fair It smiled amid his golden hair. And sheds its fragrance o'er the somb, Where sleeps my first-born in his bloom. CREASY VALLEY May Sub. 1856.
